Uncovering Our Earliest Ancestor: The Link - Wikipedia

It's about the strange fossil found in the Messel coal pit in Germany in the 1960s, a brilliantly detailed 47 million year old early primate that seems to make a decisive link between the earliest mammals and humans.

The Link: Uncovering Our Earliest Ancestor by Colin Tudge

The importance tentatively ascribed to the Ida fossil is that it predates the evolutionary divergence of monkeys and apes from lemurs and tarsiers. Hence the title "The Link", with its resonance in the long acrimonious debate over Darwinism.

BBC One - Uncovering Our Earliest Ancestor: The Link

To scientists, a true link between, say, humans and our closest living relatives, chimps, would be the single ancestral species that split into two lineages, one ultimately giving rise to living chimpanzees and the other to modern humans. Yet the paleontological record is spotty — less than 1 percent of all the species that ever lived are known to us as fossils — so we can't expect to find the remains of that single ancestral species.
